Dear Steve:

How should I react to a husband who is cheating on me? I found out from my cousin that my husband was seen with another woman at a local bowling alley. The person who saw them is my cousin's neighbor's wife's boss, so I know it must be true.

Last May we celebrated our 12th month of marriage. Should I confront him with the proof? I won't take your advice, but I am curious what a chauvinist pig like you will say!

Dear Paula: Pigs say “oink”, and cows say “moo”.. Now I know some of them can write too. There is most likely a good explanation why he was there – if he was. The proof doesn't sound solid, but let me say this: Even if you caught him in the act, you should give him the benefit of the doubt. Next!

Dear Steve:

My problem is my sister. She married a man ten years older than her. Since her marriage, she has completely changed. She has become his property. He tells her what to do and when to do it. He treats her like his slave girl. She dresses up in sexy lingerie and dances for him on his command. She cooks whatever he wants for supper and hand feeds him like a child. She has completely lost all of her self esteem and this makes me sick. What can I do about her problem? Signed, Worried Sister in Seabrook

Dear Worried: I guess I don't understand the question. What's the problem?

Dear Steve:

I suspect that my husband is seeing another woman. Last weekend he didn't come home until 6 in the morning. He said he worked late and got lost driving around. I went out to his truck to clean it up for him and noticed cigarette butts in the ash tray with red lipstick on them. Then I noticed panties under the seat that were twice my size, they were not mine. I immediately went inside and woke my husband, ever so gently with a frying pan and demanded an explanation. He told me that he can't remember where the cigarette butts came from, and that he bought the panties for me as a present at a garage sale. This whole thing sounds fishy. Do you think he might be cheating? Sherry in Bacliff

Dear Sherry: You are being ungrateful and paranoid. Your husband has been working hard and you should be more understanding. The guy obviously thought enough of you to buy you a gift. The fact that he got the wrong size, got lost driving home, and can't remember the lipstick smoker are all clear indications of a health problem, Alzheimers Disease. This poor man needs your compassion and support in this time of illness, and you are responding with petty jealousy and false accusations. You ought to be ashamed.

Dear Steve:

I am a 31 year old man and I have been married for nine years. Last week my doctor told me that I had Gonorrhoea. I confronted my wife about it. She said I must have contracted this disease from a toilet seat. Is this likely or even possible?

Need to Know in Dickinson.

Dear Needs: Yes it's easy to catch this while sitting on a commode. But only if you are having sex while sitting on that commode with your lying, cheating, two-timing wife!
